

Strategic Alliances

Accomplishments: September 2006 to August 2007

- Strategic alliances include mutually beneficial relationships with other educational institutions in the nation and abroad, private sector partners, alumni, patrons, retirees, and friends. Emory continues to build on existing partnerships or forge new ones to advance the strategic plan
- In February 2008, delegations from Emory and Ethiopia's Addis Ababa University held a workshop at AAU to evaluate the past year of a collaborative relationship and to refine the programs and focus of the partnership. Goals were set for the coming year in areas such as information technology; administrative capacity building; work in the health sciences; and advancing Ph.D. education
- Emory and Georgia Tech have partnered to propose the creation of the Global Water Research Institute, which would address the world's increasingly urgent need for clean and accessible water
- The Institute for Developing Nations met in Liberia in early March with its newly formed Working Group on Gender Violence. The aim was to help further the work of The Carter Center through community education about the law in rural areas and better understanding of how traditional practices and national laws might be harmonized

Accomplishments: September 2005 to August 2006

- EVP Mike Mandl led a delegation of senior administrators to Addis Ababa University, in Ethiopia to explore partnerships that would benefit both AAU and Emory
- Planning for Institute for Global Development has moved forward rapidly, building significantly on the partnership between Emory and The Carter Center. Tom Robertson has been appointed interim director
